Edward I Summons the "Model Parliament"

Edward I's expensive campaigns against Wales and Scotland required revenue that could be raised only by imposing heavy taxation. To gain consent for that taxation he had to resort to frequent meetings of parliament. The composition of the parliament worried, as did their business, much of which was judicial, but the writ that went out in 1295, summoning representatives from shires and the towns to meet with the king and the great barons payments due to her as tenant-in-

In their 24-yr absence, the Pulos had been given up for dead. Their kin did not recognize them. They were in rags, and emitted "a certain indescribable smock of TARTAR, talk in an odd accent." But this shabby trio soon put on a flamboyant display, Assembling relatives to scratch them rip open their ragged clothes and remove "vast quantities" of rubies, diamonds, and emeralds.
